Their products are engineered to meet local standards, with pre-fixed joiners to reduce installation time and labor costs. They serve major infrastructure, industrial, and commercial projects across the country.

Considerations for Choosing Anti-Corrosion Cable Trays

Material: FRP trays are non-conductive and highly resistant to corrosion, while coated or galvanized steel provides robust mechanical strength with corrosion protection. Environment: For coastal or chemically aggressive environments, FRP or Zn-Mg-Al coated steel is recommended. Installation: Pre-assembled fittings and modular systems reduce labor costs and installation time.

Longevity: Look for products with long design life warranties, such as Treadwell's 50-year FRP trays. These manufacturers provide a range of anti-corrosion cable management solutions suitable for industrial, commercial, and infrastructure projects in New Zealand, ensuring durability and compliance with local standards.
